Family Life & Relationships

If there is anything that merits the metaphor of "minefield" it is this subject. Say or write something controversial and one risks a media firestorm on the one hand or a chilling condemnation on the other. Family life issues touch on areas of marriage, sexuality, procreation, abortion, gender identification, caring for the sick and vulnerable, genetic manipulation etc. These are deeply personal issues and it is very easy to induce burdens of confusion, shame, anxiety and guilt. Reactions are understandably strong either way. All of us struggle with these issues and yet we are called to be healers, albeit, wounded ones.

Centuries of ignorance, patriarchy, repression and condemnation across many cultures and religious traditions have caused untold suffering and produced a collective psyche wounded and alienated from the body. Judgement and condemnation have prevented openness, honesty and a healthy acknowledgement of many issues.

The Church, its people and its clergy, has suffered greatly as a consequence of this multi-faceted dysfunction. Only in recent years has the full extent of the problem begun to emerge. The child abuse scandal, a great evil in itself, is really a symptom of this broader and deeper malaise.

Our secular society itself is equally conflicted and confused as indicated by the disparity between the age of consent and the age definition of a minor. On the one hand it openly promotes or tolerates the commercial exploitation of sex and is ambivalent about casual or recreational sex. On the other hand it still celebrates families, faithfulness & responsibility, it outlaws discrimination, it openly abhors the abuse of the vulnerable, harassment and the misuse of power or wealth to procure sexual favours etc.

Society has in part reacted against the inherited (medieval) negativities but the reaction itself has been blighted by its own naiveties which have left us with a whole lot of other problems (e.g. How do we give compassionate help to those who experience a gender mismatch without causing unnecessary gender confusion in other children?).

These issues are now becoming globalised which has led to culture wars, deeper divides between "progressive" and "conservative" cultures. There is rapid liberalisation in some countries and severe repression in others. Human relationships and sexuality are powerful forces and how they are lived and coped with has huge repercussions for every society. Help, support, formation, education and even regulation have always been deemed necessary in one form or another, for good or ill, according to the different cultural frameworks.

In principle there needn't be any conflict between supporting the (majority), heterosexual family unit and also those (minority) in same-sex relationships. Its about doing all one can to help all relationships be truly loving, caring, responsible and nurturing.

Its evident that the Church hierarchy has lost credibility on these issues. What we need now is a forum for families and individuals to have their say and to freely explore these issues without fear of hasty rejection or reaction. (Synodality is something that Pope Francis is trying to encourage in the Church – the whole Church listening & exploring together under the guidance of the Holy Spirit). How to live together, how to sustain relationships or live singly, how to cope with sexual desire or loneliness, how to help young people in the often long period between puberty and marriage or life partnership, how to really love others who are different in some way, how to protect the unborn child, how to care for each other when we are ill or frail or helpless, how to face the opportunities and challenges of our increasing ability to manipulate our genetic make-up? And if we imagine there are neat and easy solutions to these questions we need to wise up. For us who are Catholic Christians we need to ask ourselves how do we image and reflect God's love in all our human relationships? (DMA).
